Detering International Terrorism and Rogue States: US ...

After the horrific terrorist attacks of 11 September 2001 in Washington and New York, Western governments became almost singularly focused on deterring future attacks. The efforts of these governments took numerous forms, including the American led campaign against al Qaeda, United Nations Security Council Resolutions 1373 and 1540, and the influx of unprecedented resources to the security and ...

Deterring Terrorism | TRAC

Deterring terrorism is too vague a concept. Deterrence as a counterterrorism strategy depends on a bottom-up approach; a top-down approach, at best, creates a negative trickle-down effect. States must deter problematic socio-economic systems in order to prevent the individual from seeking out extreme measures for self-worth, which will, by extension, ultimately deter the terrorist organization.

While deterrence can be an effective strategy to prevent the proliferation of nuclear weapons to rogue states, it fails to curtail international terrorism. Since the last decade, terrorism has become an act of violation of territorial integrity of nations by people from across the racial spectrum within and outside the American borders.

Contemporary research and studies indicate that deterring VNSAs can be located in the frame of the fourth wave of deterrence research (Lupovici, 2010; Knopf, 2010), which sheds light on the appropriate role of deterrence now, and investigates untraditional prospects to deter rogue states and terrorism (Knopf, 2012).

The Viability of Deterring Terrorism

Deterring state sponsors of international terrorist organizations presents perhaps the most theoretically straightforward attempt to utilize deterrent strategies in the war on terrorism. Even those who are generally skeptical of deterrence being applied to terrorism believe the U.S. may be able to deter states from harboring or supporting terrorist organizations.
