Greek writer Ersi Sotiropoulos's novel, What's Left of the Night, is a lyrical and erotic reimagining of the gay Greek-Alexandrian poet C.P. Cavafy's three-day trip to Paris in 1897. The book, which won the prestigious Prix Méditerranée Étranger, is dizzying, fevered and beautiful, and very, very horny.

Futures: Poetry of the Greek Crisis presents a quite different picture with a specific focus. Instead of arguing that poetry has been denouncing an ontic crisis transhistorically, it selects works that enact poetically the concrete crisis as they attempt, according to editor Theodoros Chiotis's introduction, "to reclaim language from a semantic over-determination imposed by the increasingly abstract processes of finance" (ii).

"The [Greek economic] crisis was not simply financial," writes editor and translator Theodoris Chiotis in his introduction to Futures: Poems of the Greek Crisis; "it was the dissolution of a fantasy of a world that perhaps never was." The destruction of this "fantasy"—of a democratic society fully integrated with the European Union—understandably leaves anger and bitterness in its wake, as the poems in this anthology demonstrate.
