Over 150 bronze bowls were found in a palace at the city of Nimrud. These bowls were made in Phoenicia (modern-day Lebanese and Syrian coasts), and were brought to Nimrud as tribute or booty by one of the kings who campaigned in the west, perhaps Tiglath-pileser III (reigned 744-727 BCE). Neo-Assyrian Period, 800-700 BCE.

century BC. Markoe points out that the vessels in bronze precede those in silver (which is often gilt), the latter appearing about 700 BC. The tradition of shallow bronze bowls with a central rosette medallion is, however, known from earlier contexts, in particular from tomb contexts at Lefkandi on Euboea dating to the tenth century BC. Several bronze bowls, some with decoration that recalls according to the excavator

This bowl was part of a hoard found by Sir Henry Layard in 1850-1851 CE in the North-West Palace at Nimrud (ancient Kalhu). They were probably deposited there in the 8th century BCE. The decoration on the bowls is Phoenician, very similar in many respects to the that of the so-called "Nimrud ivories". The bowls might have been tribute or taken as booty by the Assyrians during one of their military campaigns in the western part of the Assyrian Empire.
