PSYCHOLOGICAL TEXTS explicating theories of creativity place a tremendous importance on the intrinsic dimension of creativity. Carl Jung once observed that “the creation of something new is not accomplished by the intellect but by the play instinct acting from inner necessity.”¹ The idea of “play” suggests that many authors create in an imaginary world much like a child in a sandbox ...

Comment by koodoo I feel like this is a reference to the Dark Souls series, considering that the model design is pretty much EXACTLY like the giants in Dark Souls 2, and that it is the "soul of the forge", rather than "essence of the forge" or something in that vibe. I think, personally, it's really cool that blizzard would do something like that (if that is the case) :))

Forging the soul: 'Iñigo' at the White Bear Theatre. James Hanvey SJ found himself captivated by 'Iñigo', Jonathan Moore's new play about the life of St Ignatius, now on stage at London's White Bear Theatre. This intelligent production explores 'that strange asymmetry between the life and the achievement' of Ignatius, and in doing so it issues the audience with a subtle invitation to participate in the drama of divine presence.
